

POETRY.

HOPE.

As oft the traveller is decoy'd, Who spies the meteor's light, And wanders on to gain enjoy'd A shelter for the night.

Health pursues th' illusive gleam, O'er many a rugged heath, Till, plunging in some hidden stream, He shuts his eyes in death.

So Hope, delusive Hope beguiles Us mortals here below; She tempts us with her golden smiles, Then leaves us sunk in woe.

A lady, of quick apprehension, dropped her glove by the side of a gentleman of the name of Page, who was, according to the phrase, "An Old Beau," and who, gallantly picking it up, and returned it to the lady with the following words:

If from your glove you take the letter G, Your glove becomes—what I devote to thee. To which she returned; If you from Page, but take the letter P, It then becomes—what will not do for me.
